Experience and Reflection

This seminar, featuring the work of Joan Didion, David Foster Wallace, and Primo Levi, will focus on experience and reflection in first-person creative nonfiction. The seminar will ask the following, among other questions: How is meaning generated and impression conveyed through descriptive language that brings to life experience? How is meaning conveyed through more expository or reflective language? How does descriptive language and reflective language work together? Finally, if it is the task of creative nonfiction (as it is the task of other creative genres) to generate reflection on the part of the reader, how is a writer to accomplish this?

Required Reading: Survival in Auschwitz, Primo Levi, Touchstone Press
Joan Didion’s “Slouching Towards Bethlehem” and David Foster Wallace’s “A Supposedly Fun Thing I’ll Never Do Again”

Poetry – Carrie Jerrell (FH 206)

Robert Lowell

Robert Lowell is an inarguably crucial figure in 20th century poetry, best known by most readers for his role in the development of Confessionalism, his struggles with manic depression, and his tumultuous personal life. Poems such as “The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket” and “Skunk Hour,” along with his collection Life Studies, are heavily anthologized and appear on nearly every recommended reading list. Though our discussions will not exclude these elements of Lowell’s life and work, this seminar will focus more intensely on aspects of Lowell’s poetry that are more often, and unfortunately, overlooked: his interest in translation, his poetry of political witness, his return to form and experimentation with the sonnet in the 1970s, his obsessive revision of his own poems, and his work as a critic.

Required Reading: Robert Lowell: Collected Poems, edited by Frank Bidart and David Gewanter (FSG, 2003). Specific readings and any supplementary materials will be emailed to students.
